BADLY ICED UP.

Sch. Alice M. Guthrie Arrived at Boston Yesterday.

Among the arrivals at Boston yesterday was the schooner Alice M. Guthrie, Capt. Martin Guthrie, of that port, from Georges, with 40,000 pounds of haddock. The vessel was literally covered with ice when she swung into her berth on the south side of the pier. The deck and hull were heavily encased, while the shrouds and ratlines were five times their usual size with their icy coverings. The nests of dories were frozen solid, and the gear and deck fittings were buried under several inches of ice.

The Guthrie had a severe time in the blizzard, and although she escaped damage of importance, her decks were swept by the seas, which froze wherever they struck. The vessel came into the bay without her exact position being known to those on board, and she lay on and off until it cleared, when the twin lights on Thacher's island were made and the vessel's course was shaped for Boston.

The other vessels arriving were all more or less iced up.

THROUGH GALE AND SNOW.

Capt. Bohlin Drives Constellation Home Flying.

PASSAGE MADE IN SIX DAYS.

Brings Late News from Fleet of Herring Vessels.

Schs. Constellation, Capt. Thomas Bohlin, from Newfoundland with a cargo of frozen herring, and sch. Ella M. Goodwin, Capt. James Goodwin, from the Cape Shore with a nice fare of fresh fish, arrived at this port this morning, being the first crafts to arrive from off shore since the beginning of the big storm of Saturday.

The Constellation left Bay of Islands, N. F. last Wednesday night and so has made the passage home in the hustling time of six days. Considering the freezing weather and heavy gales which have swept the coast the past week, the passage is a remarkably quick one and shows that Capt. Bohlin drove the craft for all she was worth every mile of the way.

He reports a very stormy passage, encountering heavy gales from southeast around to northeast with a heavy touch now and then from the northwest. The craft had a fair chance out of the Gulf, passing Scatteri just after dark, and from there on the passage was one of continual gales and snow storms.

Off Liscomb Friday night just as the snow shut in at dark and the wind was breezing up he spoke the sch. Gossip, who reported him, as previously stated in the TIMES.

On Saturday night he got the first crack from the northeast blizzard which swept this coast, but kept his craft going just the same. The northwester which followed the blizzard here he got but little of.

On Sunday morning just before daybreak, the Constellation had a most narrow escape. It was blowing a gale and the snow was thick as a board, when Capt. Bohlin saw a light and a dark object coming right for them. The light appeared to be right over their heads so close was it when first seen. It was a big steamer ploughing along through the storm.

Quick work on the Constellation enabled her to just get out of the path of destruction and the big iron monster rushed by, much too close for comfort. It was indeed a most narrow and fortunate escape and all breathed easier when the big black hull disappeared in the snow curtain astern.

The rest of the way the craft met some easterly and some head winds and the severest kind of cold weather. There was so much solid water rushing over her deck as she was driven along that that part did not ice up much but the freeboard and rigging as well as the bowsprit and forward were thickly encased in ice, where the flying spray hit and stayed.

Capt. Bohlin reports that when he left, herring had struck again in the North Arms and he considered the chances good for all the vessels to secure cargoes of herring.

He was on board the Atalanta, two or three times after her accident, which has been previously reported. The Atalanta had arrived in North Arm only the night before. A gale sprang up next morning and a Nova Scotia vessel which was made fast alongside the refrigerator vessel J. K. Manning broke adrift and came down on the Atalanta, taking out her bowsprit clean to the knight heads, carrying away her fore rigging, smashing in her covering board from the knight heads to aft of the fore rigging and smashing planks forward so that from the forecabin one could look out of doors. The crew did not want to come home in the vessel and it was hard work to get any repairs made there.

Good Fares.

Sch. Olga, Capt. Horace Wildes, is at Boston this morning with a fine fare of 55,000 pounds of fresh fish.

Sch. Ella M. Goodwin, Capt. James Goodwin is at this port this morning from the Cape Shore after a very quick trip with a dandy fare of 60,000 lbs. fresh fish.
